SECRETARY WILSON TALKS OF GROWING OF SUGAR

Head of the Department of Agriculture Says Hawaii Will Not Compete With Beet Growers.

"THE operations of the sugar trust in cutting the price of sugar out West, where the beets are grown, are likely to convince the American people that the beet industry is not controlled by the trust," said Secretary of Agriculture Wilson today. "The growth of the sugar beet industry has alarmed the trust, which consists of interests that refine imported raw sugar. The sugar beet factories do their own refining, finishing the product and putting it on the market. This department has been well satisfied for some time that it is only a question of time when all the sugar used in America can be made within the states of the Union."

"To what extent the sugar trust is disposed to spend money in fighting the development of the sugar beet industry I do not know. I am not at all surprised at the movement of the sugar trust. It would no doubt be very profitable to its members if they could destroy this new industry, that promises to supply home demands within a reasonable number of years, but I think their efforts will be in vain. Our people are gradually learning the value of the by-products of the sugar beet factories, and as soon as they fully comprehend these, opposition from any quarter will be entirely in vain."

"I believe also that the time will come when none of the islands of the sea will be able to produce sugar as cheaply as it can be produced in connection with diversified agriculture in the prairie states of the Northwest."

"I had an interview within the last few days with a superintendent of one of the largest sugar estates in the Hawaiian Islands," continued Secretary Wilson, "which confirms the impression I had regarding the future of the sugar industry in tropical countries. It costs more for labor in the Hawaiian Islands than in the states of the Mississippi Valley, and this superintendent is my authority for the statement that it costs $38 an acre to fertilize the lands of the Hawaiian Islands. They put on half a ton of fertilizer every year, and get two crops in three years, averaging two tons to the acre."

"The use of this fertilizer is exceedingly expensive. They have to send to South America for the nitrogen, to Germany for the potash, and to the Florida coast for the phosphorus. They have been increasing the area of sugar production in Hawaii by pumping water on lands where it will not flow by gravity. They have to send for coal to Australia or British Columbia. All this makes sugar growing more and more difficult, but the labor question out there is what gives them the most annoyance. The Porto Ricans who were imported are so much reduced by starvation that they cannot perform much manual labor. Hawaii will have difficulty in competing with the sugar beet resources of the northern states of the Union as soon as our farmers have had time to apply machinery to the field and the factory."

It will not be necessary in the United States, where sugar beets are grown, to fertilize the lands. Under a system of rotation, which can be practiced profitably, the lands of the Mississippi Valley can produce a crop of beets once in four or five years without detriment to the soil. It is only a question of time when the dairymen of the United States will discover that the by-product of the sugar mill is valuable for all domestic animals. In foreign countries it is even fed to horses. It will take the place with the western dairymen of bran from the wheat mills and by-products from the oil mills, glucose factories, etc. The water will be pressed out of the pulp very soon, and in fact, it is being done now in California, and the farmer will haul home the cake when he takes beets to the factory. The by-product contains all the elements of nutrition the domestic animal requires. Taking the sugar from the beet really reduces its feeding quality but little, because the animal gets all the carbonaceous matter it requires in its fodder.

"About three years ago we had some 30,000 tons of beet sugar produced in the United States, two years ago about 56,000 tons, a year ago about 82,000 tons, and this year we will have something like 200,000. The following table shows an estimate of sugar beet production in 1901, made by experts who have been watching the sugar beet development, and it is particularly interesting:

Estimated beet sugar production 1901 (tons)—
California	80,000
Michigan	60,000
Colorado	20,000
Utah	15,000
Nebraska	7,000
New York	7,000
Wisconsin	3,000
Minnesota	2,000
Washington	2,000
Oregon	2,000

Total	198,000
Cane sugar (tons)—
Southern states	300,000
Porto Rico	100,000
Hawaii	300,000
Total	700,000

"It is eminently wise for the farmer to grow beets and sell sugar, because he only disposes of something that comes from the atmosphere, for the pulp is fed to the dairy cow and everything taken from the soil is restored to the soil, and there is no deterioration whatever. It will not be many years before all the money now paid foreigners for agricultural products of all kinds, including sugar, will be kept at home. Last year we sent abroad $480,000,000 worth of farm products, in round figures, and bought half that amount from foreign countries. It is only a question of time when not only our sugar, but our tobacco and rice will all be produced at home. In fact, we began helping the rice industry three years ago, and the last crop has been estimated to be equal to the home demand, so we will save what money has been sent abroad for rice."

"We are establishing experiment stations on the islands that have lately come under our flag. We will endeavor to teach those people how to produce the things we cannot produce within the old United States, so that they may have money with which to buy things that we do produce here."—Chicago Record-Herald.

La Paloma to the Front.

Clarence W. Macfarlane's yacht La Paloma, which is at present resting in the placid waters of Pearl Harbor, will probably soon be seen again in this port, as she is to undergo several changes which will have to be made here. The vessel is now having the mahogany and other woodwork which ornaments her interior scraped as it is to be revarnished. Before she leaves Pearl Harbor an attempt will be made to clean off her sides and as far down as possible the large patches of barnacles and marine growths which have accumulated while the yacht has been out of commission. It is possible, however, that she is so foul that she will have to be towed to this city.

When the La Paloma arrives here she is to be thoroughly overhauled and fitted and she will probably also be re-rigged. Mr. Stone, the designer of the schooner yacht, has been with Mr. Macfarlane at Pearl Harbor and has planned to convert the boat into a yawl rig. The main mast with the large boom will then be replaced by a jigger mast while the fore mast will remain as it is.
